- Creative in integrated marketing communications (IMC)

Definition:

This is a creative way of solving complex communicative problems within a limited period of time with synergetic use of several types of marketing communications.

For instance, the task may be shaping a group of loyal customers with the use of PR, advertising and marketing tools. The task of a creator is not only to develop general creative line, but also to develop the idea of synergetic combination of the instruments.

The word “synergy” is translated as “joint action energy” (derived from the Greek “syn” – “co-“, “jointly”, and “ergos” – “action”).

The synergetic effect in integrated marketing communications appears as a result of combining advantages of each separate instrument of marketing communications. For example, PR is largely about building the trust, whereas advertising stimulates the sales of the product, and Marketing induces the consumers to promptly purchase the product.

II. Tactical creatives

Definition:

This is a way to accomplish one communicative task within a limited period of time for conducting one marketing communication session.

For instance, in advertising this may be a task to develop a slogan or a scenario for a commercial. This can also be a task to develop a conceptual idea for a narrowly-focused campaign using various advertising vehicles (television, radio, press), but in all the cases, it will be considered tactical creative, since a specific problem is solved within a short period (1-3 months) using one type of marketing communication.

Using tactical creative approach, a number of tasks in all the areas of marketing communications can be accomplished, such as corporate design and packaging, direct advertising, Public Relations, Direct Marketing, Special Events, Internet, Exhibitions, printed materials and souvenirs and other new nontraditional advertising forms.
